Some of the very earliest records can be found in the Cooper County Stray Books. These books are not located at the Cooper County Court House in Boonville, Missouri; but reside with the Western Historical Manuscript Collection. As a result, most people are unaware of the existence of these valuable genealogical records.

In the days before wire fences or even split rail fences, animals were allowed to roam free on the owner's land. As a result, horse, cows, hogs, and sheep were often "lost and found" items. I am not an expert or even novice on this but it appears that in some counties such as Howard and Boone a person would advertise finding a stray animal. If no one came to claim the animal it was a case of finders keepers. In Cooper County it appears that after finding a stray animal, the person would notify the Justice of the Peace in the Township where the animal was found. A description of the animal(s) was provided to the Justice of the Peace who would then have two people appraise the value of the animal(s). In some cases, the Justice of the Peace would also have a person testify as to the accuracy of the description of the animal(s). Finally, the Justice of the Peace for the Township would have all of this information recorded by the county clerk. In some cases, the owner of the animal(s) would come forth and claim his livestock. If not at the end of one year the person who found the animal(s) provided they still had the animal would be required to pay one-half of the appraised value of the animal to the county treasurer. I am sorry but it was some ways through the records that I figured all of this out. And I did not properly copy all of the information.

What these records do is to prove a date in which a person resided in Cooper County and it gives the township in which they lived. As one might expect some of those townships are not located within the present day boundaries of Cooper County, Missouri. The other information that these records provide are the names of a person's neighbors or relatives. As you read through this information you will notice that the appraisers are generally neighbors or relatives of the person who found an animal.

Finally a word of caution. Literacy was not a trait that all people shared. Names and locations were often spelled as they sound not as they are written. Plus in many instances the writer must have received a D- in spelling. I have done my best to interpret the old script and faithfully record this information.

Enjoy! James F. Thoma, January, 2000.
